The Love, Money and Work

For many people, having a lot of money is the greatest dream of their life, so they are manically controlled by their thoughts and feelings about it and will do anything for money, from being stingy to theft, fraud, and robbery, to murder, manslaughter and betrayal. In this sense, many even sell their own bodies, be it for prostitution or for organ transplants, etc. In truth, however, money is nothing more than a means to an end, i.e. a means of earning a living, acquiring all kinds of necessary or luxury goods, as well as being able to afford a home and means of transport, paying for necessary insurance, etc. Money is therefore only a servant of man, which must be properly allocated and used in order to get by and to be able to honestly fulfill all financial obligations. However, in order to acquire money, it is necessary to do a daily amount of paid work. However, acquiring money unlawfully, such as through criminal activities such as dishonesty, theft, lies and fraud, or even through serious crimes such as robbery, murder and manslaughter, is socially contemptuous and never a path that leads to success and a clear conscience.

If money is needed, then the right and honest way is to earn it through your own work and then to manage it properly. So, if money is needed to ensure all the necessities of life are met, then it must be worked for honestly. Of course, the provision of life and all the necessities of life can be met not only through money, but also in other ways, such as in exchanged kind, but this also requires a certain amount of honest work, which can take many forms. To do this, people must be alert to many forms and perceive and accept everything in the way that the opportunity for the necessary provision in an impeccable and honest manner presents itself. The money earned must be budgeted in a planned manner in order to be able to meet all financial obligations and also to put a little bit aside. Money is and always will be just a means to an end, which also includes the security of not falling into need and misery or into debt. By accepting and using money as a form that is only intended for a specific purpose in every respect, people ensure their livelihood and security, that they can always meet their financial obligations without any problems and that they do not become dependent on anyone or indebted to anyone.

If a person manages his honestly earned money correctly, he will always have plenty of it, even if he earns little. The only thing that is needed is to divide the money very carefully according to the really necessary needs and not to spend it uselessly and senselessly on things that do not meet the need for a real need. And only if you work honestly for the money will it flow to the person with a clear conscience, and then he can then happily and contentedly grab it and manage it correctly and with a clear conscience. If the money is handled correctly, there will be no shortage, nor will there be any hesitation in using it in the right way to manage everything financially without any problems. The correct handling of money enables a person to satisfy all of his really necessary needs, to be financially independent and to fulfill his wishes, provided these remain within the scope of what is reasonable and do not exceed the budget of what is possible. Handling money correctly creates constant confidence, because it is connected to the knowledge that with the correct handling of financial resources, no debt problems, poverty and hardship, misery, and suffering, etc. will arise.
